

Feed advisory program set up for farmers

Dr. L. G. Young, Animal Science, is shown with the Kjeldahl apparatus used for the determination of protein content in feeds

A new advisory program set up at the University of Guelph and sponsored by the Ontario Department of Agriculture and Food will help Ontario farmers determine the quality of their home grown livestock feeds.

"We hope this feed advisory program will result in more effective use of home grown feeds and increase economical livestock production," says Dr. Les Young of the Department of Animal Science who is a program coordinator.

Under its terms, livestock producers will be able to submit samples of feed together with information regarding their livestock production program. "We will analyze the samples," says Dr. Young, "especially for protein and moisture and send results to county Agricultural Representatives. The Agricultural Representatives prepare feeding recommendations designed to make economical use of available feed supplies."

The program is prepared to handle up to 2,500 samples during the next year, he says. It is hoped that each sample will be processed within ten days of its receipt. A charge will be levied for each feed sample analyzed to make the program self-supporting.
